Preface:

While writing essays for my website, I suddenly realized that the highest truth is 'Nothing matters', and felt the need for writing a book on it. The second thought about it was that someone can misuse the book to find excuse in doing wrong things when he comes across this book. Then I thought those who want to do the negatives will do it anyway and just my writing a book will not make much difference to the world. There are enough safeguards everywhere.

The most difficult aspect I find in writing a book in nonfiction genre is filling up pages because I do not want to write anything that is not valuable to the reader. Moreover, I thought a book with a simpler and concise concept will spare readers' time, while I get express my current idea. Considering these aspects I decided to just have a small section on the main idea of the book, 'Nothing Matters', which is followed by another section which contains essays from my website. I strongly believe that a small useful concept that triggers a positive framework is better than a voluminous reading. The gist of this book is that many things affect us more because we assume those things matter. When nothing matters to us our mind is relaxed and free from the worries.

It is suggested to the readers that after studying the entire book he or she makes relevant notes to carry out regular mental inputs for sustained level of psychological ascent to sail through her term of life.

Please be informed that Equality Persists and Nothing Matters are just a decision to be taken for maintaining better mindset and not to be analyzed or debated.

SECTION I NOTHING MATTERS and EQUALITY PERSISTS

'Nothing Matters', is the simple truth which holds good for any other truth and we can’t say that anything else is bigger once we achieve it. If nothing matters what can affect us and which else can be a higher level statement than that? Can we answer what really matters at the end of our lives or the world, which is inevitable? Moreover, everything matters only because we perceive it as it matters. We can perceive anything the way we want. It is just that we go by our mindsets. Anything about which the perceptions differ based on our mindset is not real and hence does not matter. However, one can say that if nothing matters there should be equality everywhere. The fact of the matter is that equality does persist.

Explanation for `Equality Persists'

When we consider both our life situations and our psychological conditions we will realize that there is equality maintained because every positive aspect in life has a hidden grey area and every difficult situation has a hidden silver lining. What appears good from one angle will appear in totally opposite way if observed from another angle. For example if something goes very smooth for a person it would mean it went too easy for the person and hence not of much credit. If a person has very volatile life it would mean he was a part of a great story. If someone had a very tragic life it would mean he has carried more weight in life because every aspect of life has to be balanced in the right proportion for sustaining the life and his share of contribution in suffering will be higher. If someone has a short life it would mean less period of burden. Moreover, we feel good or bad about ourselves only because we decide to feel so in our comparisons. Therefore, if we decide that equality persists, most of us will feel good about themselves. Moreover, nothing really matters in our limited life span, unless we perceive in exaggerations. Everything is just plain existence of varying patterns of shape and sensitivities unless we give too much meaning to them. If we start from the premise that equality persists, we will surely start seeing equality everywhere. When we realize the highest truth that nothing matters, inequality is naturally nonexistent.

Explanation for `Nothing Matters'

If we consider our personal life all that matter is that we should feel good. There are three possessions with us, which are our physical health, mental health and resources. Our emotions, intelligence, social interactions and all the mental diseases come under the mental health. Our energy levels, strength, flexibility and all bodily ailments come under the physical health. Our schooling, career, business, wealth and all assets including connections come under the resources. Therefore, the worst case scenario for me in these three aspects may be that I or my loved one got cancer, got depression and became bankrupt. Should we worry or say nothing matters and I will make a mindset that nothing affects me, after all the life is short and ultimately we will get through with the bondage of life. This way we can overcome the depression. When bankruptcy happens two things happen. It will make disturbed situation at home, which we can handle in a situation like depression. The other aspect of it is that we may not have a place to live or food to eat. This will make a physical health problem. Moreover, if we are sound mentally all physical health issues only lead to pain. Pain is the only uncomfortable aspect which we need to face, when we have physical health issue and we do not have money to buy pain killers. If we read my essays you will realize that the pain that we experience is actually being experienced by different parts of the source of life with our body shape moving along covering the parts in pain. In fact the body which we see is constructed and projected in our mind based on the patterns surrounding it. When we move or the earth moves only the patterns and shape of the body gets reconstructed along the traversal. Therefore, when we experience the pain it is actually being experienced by different parts of the life source. Even this pain is for duration of less than one millisecond at one spot due to the rotation and revolution of the earth. The essay on 'Illusion of Life' will clearly explain this. However, our realizations happen best at incremental level and therefore, if you are not convinced about the concept of 'Nothing Matters', it is suggested to serially study all the essays in the second section.

Why should we achieve the highest truth?

Most of our psychological flaws like unhappiness, desires, fears, anger, depression etc., stem from the fact that something matters. If nothing matters, then all these flaws get corrected. Moreover, our mind is in control when we perceive with less intensity. The narrative of 'Nothing matters' helps us to perceive with less intensity. Therefore, it is a great purpose to achieve the highest truth. It will help to know why we got depression or deadly diseases or are very poor. At the right proportion all the negative aspects have a place because without these there will not be seriousness in our lives. We got it out of chance and there is nothing personal about it.

Caution: We have to understand that the highest truth is only for a person who has realized spiritual perfection and not for a person who still has materialistic tendency. This is for a person who has achieved psychological status similar to God. We can easily relate to God as one for whom nothing would matter. Thus for the highest being, which realizes the highest truth, nothing matters. The highest truth is the one which does not have any side effects. However, there will be lots of side effects till we reach to the truth. We as humans can only tend to reach it but never fully reach it. It is good that it is very difficult to achieve this truth because after achieving this there is nothing to strive for. Please be informed that Equality Persists and Nothing Matters are just a decision to be taken for maintaining better mindset and not to be analyzed or debated.

Summary:

The bottom line is that we feel bad about something only because of our conditioning or mindset. When we have the mindset that equality persists and nothing matters, we can be satisfied with ourselves and will have better mindsets. Moreover, when nothing matters then we can decide to have a good mood irrespective of our situation, to enable us to have maximum good moments, which is the only real personal goal as opposed to God`s goals. Please be informed that Equality Persists and Nothing Matters are just a decision to be taken for maintaining better mindset and not to be analyzed or debated.

SECTION II ESSAYS

Philosophy, Psychology and Science

Our minds can be enhanced to a great extent by applying the principles of philosophy and psychology. Religion uses these principles to lay out a format for preaching their followers in their own way. However the principles are just logic and can be decoupled from religion. The practice of philosophy and psychology happens by research on the nature of the intelligence of the higher powers and the nature of the intelligence of the mind respectively.

Philosophy for me is the realization that perceptions with higher powers' view of the world will lead to purposeful and intelligent mind. Philosophy helps us to understand the higher purposes in life, which allows us to be in alignment with our higher powers.

Psychology for me is the realization that perceptions with right priorities and perspectives will lead to purposeful and intelligent mind. Psychology helps us to understand the mechanism of our mind, which allows us to upgrade ourselves. Both psychology and philosophy lead to one another. After upgrading our minds by philosophical practices and knowing higher purposes in life, psychology tells us how to do that. After upgrading our minds by psychological practices it progresses to philosophy to explore the higher purposes in life.

While a scientist examines the mechanisms governing the matter and energy, he may also progress into philosophy to wonder why things are like this and not the other way.
Alternatively, these disciplines can be distinguished by their fundamental inquiries. Psychology investigates the essential nature of the mind, and science examines the mechanics governing all matter, energy, and existence.
Philosophy synthesizes these by addressing the deeper question of 'why' reality exists as it does, ultimately seeking paths toward psychological upliftment.

Meaning and purpose in life

We can find good meaning in life by exploring and experiencing different aspects of ourselves and the world, according to opportunities and privileges we have, however by ensuring to avoid pitfalls. Other aspects that provide meaning to our lives are overcoming challenges provided by the world, sense of belonging to the group one is identified with, and social services and contributions. Many people fail to avoid pitfalls which result in not so good experiences. If one has a strong hope and a desire to improve by looking at his or her faults it is possible to raise from the pitfalls and rise high. Blaming someone or circumstances is the only stumbling block, which one has to avoid.

There are three major purposes in life. They are sustenance, fulfillment and entertainment in the chronological order of sequence of attainment. The activities for sustenance are to ensure material requirements. The activities for fulfillment are to ensure mental satisfaction and mental upliftment. The activity for entertainment is to ensure the creation and watching of interesting stories. The problem with many is that either they look for only sustenance or they go for entertainment before fulfillment. Entertainment should be only on spare time after ensuring the activities for sustenance and fulfillment.

Mind matters

Mind does the job of thinking and deciding based on the priorities we have maintained for various aspects of life. Firm opinions or exaggerated priorities for various aspects are formed when a mind with high level of desires, fears and ego perceive the various aspects of life. Due to high intensity of perceptions during such cases, our intelligence becomes skewed and our mental bandwidth gets clogged from repeated thinking. Therefore, to start having some control over our minds we need to practice to perceive everything with lower intensity so that our thoughts do not overpower us.

Thought Management:

We need to realize and remember that thoughts initiated by our wills are different from the automatic thoughts of the mind. Only the thoughts that are initiated by our wills are stored in permanent memory, and only such thoughts become part of our intelligence. The thoughts initiated by our wills are the endorsements by the will of the incoming thoughts, answers to conscious questioning the mind, the conscious contemplation by the will and the conscious reading by the will, from an external source. Thoughts that automatically come to us are from a different location, possibly from outside our body. Such thoughts come as extrapolation by the mind of information derived from our sense perceptions or from previous perceptions of high intensity. These extrapolations by the mind serve various purposes. Sometimes their purpose is to create interesting stories. At other times great insights come through these. These also challenge us many times by misguided extrapolations that test our intelligence. Therefore, we need to keep improving our intelligence, as a process, which is separate from the incoming processes of the mind. We need to just take the hints from the incoming processes of the mind and evaluate them correctly by means of deep and calm questioning.

There are three main areas where our memories are stored.
a) Automatic regular thoughts come from thought priority queue. These come from our creators' intelligence as an extrapolation of information perceived by our sense organs or from our memories.
b) Our mental inputs and deep reasoning happen from the permanent memory. These are initiated by our wills. Mental inputs are like thinking about or reading about some important statements which improve our cumulative impressions of memories. Deep reasoning is referred to as questioning our minds for improvements and finding possible defects in our existing ways.

c) Thoughts that form our habits come from habit maps. These thoughts are stored along with habit cues and they trigger when the cuing conditions happen.

For effective thought management, we need to learn to perceive things with less importance or priority so that the thoughts from thought priority queue do not overwhelm us. We need to involve more with mental inputs and deep reasoning and just get the hints from priority queue and habit maps. While our minds keep popping up interesting and unreal stories from priority queue, we need to change our attention to where it is advantageous to us by questioning our mind on what is really important to do at this moment. To get the right answers to these questions we should have provided the mind with suitable mental inputs about the priorities and principles we wish to inculcate.

Mental Inputs

Mental inputs are a means to improve our intelligence by perceiving important philosophical concepts, in order to correct the priorities of various objects, events, or aspects that have gained exaggerated importance due to possessiveness, desire, and fear. Some of the principles or philosophies which help in correcting the skewed priorities of perceptions are as follows:

1. Everything is as it should be for the moment because there is lot of experience put in to arrive at this point by our higher powers.
2. We are sufficient for the role we are playing for the moment. We need not be perfect at all moments and gradual improvements are what we should look for.
3. Nothing is personal. Process improvements and story lines are more important than personal achievements. None of our achievements and failures is personal. They are just parts of the story and for the purpose of the story.

4. Everything is justified to happen at the proportion at which it is happening. Surely there is a reason for all the negative things that happen. We need to find the reasons with an open mind by putting ourselves in the higher powers' shoes.
5. All are equal if all things are considered. There are more things in common between people than the differences. Most of the differences between people are only in terms of different mental upgrades happening due to different conditioning initiated by self or others. In other words the basic mental capacity is the same for all. Each one is made to appear different by our higher powers, to suit the story lines.

6. Life is an illusion or a virtual reality. Therefore, we should ensure to not to take anything too seriously. We suffer more from taking things seriously than from anything else. It is prudent to consider our life as a video game and not take our challenges and failures seriously.

7. Everything is for the good. We will realize the goodness of the events later. There are silver linings everywhere.

8 .There is always a better way which we can find by gently enquiring ourselves about the solutions to things which are not up to the mark.

9. All differences in perceptions are zero if all the relevant aspects are taken into consideration. The difference between rich and poor, beautiful and ugly, week and strong, are only due to our conditioning. We can look at them all as equal if we try to change our way of perceptions.
10. Challenges and misfortunes are there to help us identify our improvement areas to grow. Our growth will have value only if it happened against the odds of challenges and misfortunes.
11. Stories being formed by our higher powers are more important than our personal milestones. We are just playing our roles with the stories in perspective.

12. Higher powers are always there for our support. They work as per their plan, which is based on our needs and that of our external world. We need to carry out our endeavors based on our best understanding and whereas our higher powers support us based on their priorities. We need to try to sync up our priorities with those of our higher powers.
13. At the end nothing matters at all. We are there for very short period and therefore we should not perceive as though something will make a huge difference to us. Nothing is permanent.

Since mind's activities are gradual and incremental in nature we need to carry our mental inputs on regular basis to be able to find observable changes in us.

Success and types of wealth

When we say a person is successful, we reckon that the person has achieved something which very few have achieved. But the word success may be defined as accomplishment of a goal. Defining right goals for success is more important than what we do. Moreover, success should not be looked at in absolute terms. In my view the goals and the level of accomplishment of the goal should be based on the resources and constraints one has and level of difficulty one has been put through. Therefore, in my view, success is about understanding ones resources, constraints, objectives, opportunities and risks and acting accordingly. We build ourselves and our companies as products and specifications to market ourselves and our company to improve our chances to attain our individual and group objectives. The resources include our body and intelligence, time, people, money and other assets one has. The constraints include required resources one does not have and any other disability one has. The objectives include achievement of those goals which give contentment. One may be content with very little where as others may not be contented with a billion. This depends on ones mindset. The opportunities include our individual ecosystem. The risks include loss of health, resources and money.

Based on the above logic, following conclusions can be drawn.
a. More one has intelligence and resources the higher should be the objectives for success.
b. One can be successful even if he or she is contended doing nothing externally. Only our mindsets make us perceive otherwise. This way of being successful is easier said than done. Such a person has to improve upon his himself (product) while ignoring the specifications.

c. Success is a relative term and cannot be compared with others.

One may put forth an argument that success should be based on contribution to society. Therefore, one cannot be successful without doing anything. I want to defend with these points.

a. Not everyone has to contribute. The pace at which we should progress should not be too fast or too slow.

b. If our creators wanted they could have made it too easy for us. In all likelihood there is no scarcity of resources to make this world. However, to provide us the learning opportunity and for us to have some seriousness God has inducted some scarcity. Considering this aspect we should not work too fast or too slow, but just in the pace which ensures good learning process.

c. Real freedom is to do what one feels interested in, rather than what the society feels each one should do. Based on pros and cons and individual resources and constraints, each individual should chart her journey. Moreover, it is the diversity of intelligence and other resources that make the world interesting and sustainable.

Who defines our own state of success?

Our marks card is our state of success in our institutions' point of view. Our promotions in the company are our success in our company's point of view. The profits in the company are success in the industry's point of view. Apart from these we should have success defined in our own points of view, which considers a small component of weightings to the others point of view and major weightings to our own points of views based on our own constraints in achieving our own goals. Our objectives are not just our career goals but include various other responsibilities. For example for someone the answers to following questions may define success, in addition to academic and career view points.

a) Are you frequently questioning your processes and your mindsets? Are you in a path of continuous progress?
b) Are you confident about taking the responsibilities towards job and family?
c) How do you face challenges at home and work?
d) How do you feel when you are put into difficult situations?
e) How satisfied are you with your life?
f) Have you utilized your time and resources in the best possible way?
g) What are your constraints and difficulty levels in your life? How are you managing them?
h) Have you been a responsible towards family and society?

i) How balanced are you while handling fights?
j) How many times you smile in a day?
k) How satisfied are you with yourself?
l) Are you regularly noticing signs of improvements here and there?
m) What are your glaring defects? How will you address them?
o) Do you feel that you are not less than anybody?
p) Are you flexible enough to consider others' view points? Do you try to change others too much?
Our own assessment of success is more important than others' points of view because we alone know our constraints and only our own points of view decide about our level of contentment. However, we should be true to ourselves. This is the minimum requirement for a self appraisal.

Types of wealth

Most of us estimate our level of success from the amount of wealth we have accumulated. However, apart from financial aspects few other types of accumulations are very important in our lives. Therefore one may say that apart from financial wealth, there are other types of wealth. The important types of wealth are described below.

There are five main types of wealth. First one is the money and other resources which enable comforts in life. Health is the second type of wealth, which is the basis of existence. The third type of wealth is our knowledge and experience, which is useful to achieve things and to cherish them. The fourth type of wealth is our family, relatives, friends and associates. Their importance can never be overestimated. The fifth and most neglected type of wealth is psychological wealth, which provides intelligence and enables mental stability during adversities. Psychological wealth is gained by regular mental inputs of important aspects of life along with their relative priorities.

The bottom line is that each one of us are successful as we can only do as per our potential. There are attractive and repulsive forces, which take us away from our potential. If these forces are stronger than our potential, naturally our achievements suffer. So, considering the forces or constraints, each one is successful. All that is needed is just a shift in our perceptions to feel satisfied and successful. The panache for all unsatisfactory experience is to change our perceptions. Our feelings of success or failure are ultimately determined by our perceptions. One can perceive success either by doing what our mind reckons as success or one can change the perception directly. It is prudent to thoroughly research and guide the mind about what is success taking into considerations, all the relevant aspects. For example for a person who is facing lots of challenges, just smiling at the end of the day after completing the days work, itself is a great success. All the five types of wealth are equally important and therefore we must invest in all the five types of wealth creation. Instead of looking for a specific type of wealth we should have gratitude for the type of wealth we have and try to grow in the area conducive to us.

Happiness, love and bliss

When we are happy about getting something, we give more importance to getting that thing than to be happy, thinking that getting that thing made us happy. Therefore, when we lose such a thing we become unhappy. Therefore, we can remain happy if our priority for being happy is more than anything that may happen. Saying to ourselves I want to be happy regardless of anything that happens will improve that priority. How much a particular aspect of life gives us happiness and the duration of happiness are dependent on the amount of importance we give to that aspect. Similarly how much unhappiness a particular aspect of life makes us and duration of sadness are dependent on the importance we give to that aspect. Therefore to maximize happiness we should have gratitude for what we have and reduce the importance of what we lack. We should also downplay our problems so that they do not overwhelm us.

One more thing that we can do to remain happy is to decide on something which will always happen and will give us maximum happiness. For example we can daily contemplate with firm belief that the passing of a day gives maximum happiness. When we do that, we will frequently realize the passing of a day with enhanced happiness. This happiness will gradually overshadow everything else. This type of contemplation leads to a very gradual change but will be very effective.

Happiness, love and bliss are similar states, with differences in reasons for the state and degree of their fleeting characteristic. To be continually blissful, we need to either perceive everything as blissful or our attention should be always on something blissful. While the first one is difficult as in this case we need to change our ways of perception, the second one is practically impossible as our mind continually brings in new thoughts, where our attention goes automatically. We could try a combination of both the approaches. In this, while we try to perceive everything as blissful, we also try to bring back our attention to something that is permanently blissful. When the reason for the bliss is an external state, it is more fleeting than when it is for an internal state. When the reason for bliss is for the internal state associated with body or mind it is more fleeting than when the reason for bliss is at the state of intelligence. However, to achieve continual bliss based on our intelligence, it takes very long time as in this case we need to undertake philosophical practices to upgrade our entire cumulative impressions in our memories.

One of the important things to achieve is to love everything around as they are.

The things that block us from realizing true love are our likes and dislikes. Real love is experienced when we realize equality mindset. Our selective likes and dislikes are impurities in our mindsets, which create attraction and repulsion. The attraction and repulsion give rise to wants and aversions. When a mind with wants and aversions come across unexpected facets of reality, the state of bliss gets disturbed. To achieve a continual state of bliss we need to work on every aspect that could break a state of bliss. Our mind should be trained to perceive all those aspects as good.
Love with a reason is not the true as loving with a reason actually loves some aspect of our desires than the person, thing or any other external or internal state. You do not need a person to love. It's all in the mindset. The closest word to love is to admire and that of pleasure is to want. When you admire something which changes its state then our state of happiness will also change accordingly. Therefore we should choose to admire something that remains the same for our lifespan. One such thing is continuous passing of time or our life. When you admire fully there is no space for want. When you fully want something there is no space for admiration. True love comes from our sufficiency and yet something to admire about. When we are not sufficient it is a combination of want and admire and therefore is just a glimpse of admiration and desire. When the admiration comes from sufficiency it has a higher position than wanting. We progress from higher levels of want to higher levels of love.

In summary, to be continually blissful, we need to either perceive everything as blissful or our attention should be always on something blissful. We are happy or sad by an event only because we give more importance to that event than to being happy or sad and paint the event as happy or sad based on our priorities in life. In other words we will be always happy if we could change the priority for being happy to be more than anything that may happen. This requires regular mental inputs on the priorities which we wish to have. One way of doing this is to imagine about all the things that made us unhappy in the past and perceive them as they were for our good by smiling through. This will change our mindsets about those situations and will enable us to be happy when these situations come by in future. When we truly love a person we see our reflection in that person. In that state there is no difference between us and our surroundings. To achieve this state a lifetime of philosophical practice may be needed.

Intelligence, knowledge and expertise

If our creators wanted they could have made us more intelligent and knowledgeable. It is very clear that their main intention is not to get things done from us for them but to make an interesting world with lots of stories along with sustained learning opportunities for millions of years. Therefore, they have made sure that things are not too easy for us and we need to gradually improve ourselves to understand and master our world. It is because of the same reason that a man with experience can do better that an intelligent novice. The gradual path of learning is planned so that the development of the world is at the right pace and also to enable creation of desired stories. It is because of our creators' plan of slow progress, that we forget what we study and have to do regular practice to remember the subject. One important side effect of the slow learning process is that we will never be able to suggest improvement areas to our creators, who have millions of years of experience. It is the first experience of the world that made our creators the most powerful. Our creators gained immense knowledge and expertise by applying intelligence to the resource of life for billions of years.

Our intelligence can be called as a process of using our will to estimate, analyze and extrapolate the information perceived by the sense organs and the mind. It can also be called as the skill to use our will to enhance our knowledge, expertise, connections and other resources based on logic and the right allocation of time, effort, resources, and people. It is the dynamic processor of the mind. It enhances our knowledge and expertise by questioning the mind for improvements. The quality and quantity of our knowledge depends on our intelligence. Our intelligence is active at every moment in deciding our next thought and action and also in estimating, analyzing and extrapolating the information from sense organs and the mind. Our intelligence decides where our attention points to at the current moment and our knowledge and expertise depend on the time of attention spent in the respective area of knowledge and expertise. In other words intelligence is just processing of memories based on some criteria in another memory location. Similar to in a computer there cannot be any processing or intelligence without memories or knowledge.

There are two aspects in developing intelligence. One is the questioning our mind for improvements and new perspectives, whenever a new thought comes. The other one is spending time on the particular area of interest to acquire incremental and cumulative expertise. The first aspect improves the speed of development and the second one increases the number of reusable solutions. There should be clear discrimination between our propensity for general improvements and the acquired experience to tackle known issues. The first aspect is like sharpening the knife and the second one is learning how to cut different types of vegetable. One of the areas where our intelligence is usually lacking and needs to be improved is estimating the priority of information. When the priority of some aspects is excessive there is wastage of time and inaccuracy of results. The incorrect priorities are due to character defects that stem from excessive desires, fears and ego. Philosophy is one of the means of correcting the priorities of various aspects of life.

Another area of improving our intelligence is to train our minds to look into depth and width of the issues against availability of time and other resources. Intelligence is at the best when the mind is peaceful and there is a habit of querying our thoughts, actions and perceptions at the right intensity and frequency.

Intelligence Quotient and Emotional Quotient: IQ and EQ tests are not accurate measures to compare intelligence of mankind. We cannot compare our intelligence with others because each one has different circumstances. The IQ and EQ tests only test the expertise to solve particular domain of problems. The IQ test tests the expertise in the math, logical reasoning, vocabulary etc. EQ test tests the expertise in the emotional or philosophical domain. Both IQ and EQ are the result of questioning and researching in the respective domains. Our knowledge is nothing but our memories. Expertise is the memory of using some skills. These are mere accumulations of memories. The process of developing expertise is doing incremental practice in the domain of the expertise. Usually it is a gradual process unless someone is gifted by some super power. Some just study the books while others develop the habit of cultivating reasoning and questioning beyond what resources are available and become an original source of information. Having resources or guidance to get a head start is a necessary condition for developing expertise in any domain. However the main aspect to develop is the habit of questioning for improvements. Such an individual will shine in any area of interest in a reasonably conducive environment.

Developing self-worth and confidence

Our self-worth should be such that we nether reckon ourselves neither inferior nor superior to anyone. Such a perception is possible if we think all are equal. We need to understand and realize that we are carrying out roles in life based on the plan of our higher powers. The plan of this world is not on the basis of perfect roles for everyone but of seriously interesting ones with lots of nuances and incremental changes. Those people who have higher achievements have it due to the kind of roles they are playing and for the roles they are playing. They are able to achieve their goals due to the support they get for the roles they are playing. Moreover, our higher powers don't give importance to only the achievers. The apparently non-achievers are significantly important for the maintenance of the ecosystem and for their story content. Therefore, we all have the same worth in the eyes of the highest powers.

In summary, we need to realize that considering all our circumstances and the belief that god is fair for everyone, we are all equal in terms of our worth.

Confidence doesn't come from surety of success alone. It comes from the realization of our sufficiency to handle the situation. We need to develop ourselves to feel sufficient besides preparing ourselves for the tasks in hand. Confidence comes from true self-worth when it is independent of any outcome. We need to realize that failure is a part of life and not get attached to success alone. Confidence comes when we reckon that nothing really is at stake. When results do not matter and giving your best shot only matters. Giving too much importance to others affects our own confidence. We should reckon that everything evens out and thus all are equal. Looking for perfection in all matters also affects our confidence. Therefore to gain confidence in facing the situation we need to first downplay the situation and make the situation appear menial and manageable. In summary, self confidence comes from the realization that we are sufficient for the shot of the scene of the story being directed by our higher powers. We need to only prepare for the future scenes, but for the current scene we are fully sufficient. Our higher powers know us in and out and are sure that we are perfect for the present scene.

Desires and fears

The desires and fears when they are excessive they lead to incorrect perceptions, which in turn lead to our giving too much importance to the aspects we desire and neglecting other equally important aspects. This results in skewed intelligence. At their right levels all desires are useful. Moreover, some desires help us more than others. If we desire to be smiling irrespective of circumstances, it is a good desire. Desire to put in our best efforts in our endeavors is a good desire. The desire to look for equality among all people is a good desire. The desire to seek happiness in life is good desire. Problem is when we desire particular results which are not in our control like marks in exams, promotion in career or profit in business. Such things depend on various factors and such desires affect our thinking and cause stress. A small measure of desire of such things cause motivation and an excess of these desires cause disappointments, stress and affect intelligence. We are not ready to get what we desire because our desires only gets factored in our decision making. However, for right decisions we need more things than just desires. For example there has to be considerations for peace, consideration for others, consideration for facts, consideration for decorum, consideration for logic, consideration for acceptance of higher desires, consideration for right priorities and perspectives along with the desire to progress. For many people, the strong desires and fears make them overlook the other necessary aspects needed for sound decision making. In other words it is desirable to have right desires, at the right intensities, in the right times of our lives.

When fears are at the right level they make us take action towards enhancing security aspects in our lives. However when the fears are excessive, they cause worries and anxiety. We need to identify all our fears and work on them individually. The action on them may be a change in perception or doing something to prevent what we fear.

In summary, desires and fears, when they are excessive, they lead to skewed intelligence and they also affect our peace of mind, which prevent us from relishing and appreciating the beauty in many different aspects of life. In other words desires and fears, when excessive, they reduce the total number of satisfying moments in our lives. Moreover, we will lose a lot of flexibility in our available choices when we have do not have the tendency to accept what has happened or could happen. Besides desires and fears, our expectations about what is fair for us to get in life, including that of fair fruits of action, may be the cause of immense frustration and disappointments.

Expectations and fruits of action

We expect all good things to happen to us and fear bad things from happening. But our lives are like roles in the movies, based on the stories scripted by higher powers, and on the needs and capabilities of the individuals. Therefore we should reckon that only a few can get lead roles and also that there may be misfortunes in life which should be handled and coped with. If we wear the shoes of our higher powers we will know what to expect in life.

When we develop good relationship with our children or parents we give more importance to them than ourselves. Similarly when we develop good relations with god we should give more importance to him than ourselves. God wants us to live our lives with the best of our abilities. However, if things do not go according to our expectations it is just because of the stories scripted by god. Therefore when we give right importance to our god we will accept any negative outcomes and perceive misfortunes and failures with sportsmanship. The stories are more important than our individual roles. There is no way god can develop a story where all favorable things are happening to everyone at all times. Surely the experienced god must have some way to maintain fairness, revealing which will affect the script and the stories yet to be directed.

If end result is only important than the final end result of everyone is death only. Therefore the journey or the process should be rejoiced and cherished and not the end result. All our actions are happening from the decisions taken from the priorities by which we tend to perceive the various aspects of life. If all the priorities are well balanced then right actions will result. When right actions match up with right opportunities the right result will happen. Moreover, as mentioned in earlier topics there are five types of wealth. The fruits of our actions may come off in any one of the types of wealth and also to any member of the family any time in the future. In short there may not be a direct and immediate consequence between action and the result. It is believed by many that we should not worry about results and only concentrate on efforts. Although this philosophy is useful, the problem is not the results but about looking for the right results. Looking out for results are no problems if we have the right priorities for important aspects of life. For example if the priority for being a better person is more than the marks in school then we will be satisfied with better me even with fewer marks. We should not look a particular result in isolation but understand how they relate to one another along with the relative priorities of one another. Our expectation from others and from fruits of actions leads to loss of flexibility in our choices in life.

Moreover, we need to realize that we plan our actions based on our priorities in life and the higher powers decide about the end results or fruits of our actions based on their own priorities.
In summary, we should have realistic expectations, along with expectations for negative results. We should focus on the things on which we have control, and let the higher powers decide about the end result. To be free from frustration and disappointments, we need to do some research about the likely causes of frustration and disappointments and try to have some acceptance about them. We need to realize that in such a vast world, with many centuries of progression, there will be myriad ways that circumstances may crop up for anybody and depending on the individual story; all possibilities of both positive and negative outcomes exist for anyone. We panic from adversities only due to not preparing ourselves mentally for the negative outcomes that can crop up from any situation, any time, for anybody.

Challenges and Misfortunes

Challenges and misfortunes are internal and external constraints imposed on us to induce the right level of difficulties in order to make our lives interesting to us and to the observer. There is value for our accomplishments only due to the difficulties faced in achieving success. The challenges in life are very important for us. Without the challenges life will soon start to become boring. There cannot be any psychological growth in us without the challenges faced by us. For example if we imagine staying in the same grade for three or four years, we will realize how life will become boring without challenges. Thus higher challenges virtually keep us growing in higher grades. We do not appreciate the challenges only because our focus is too much on the end result. Facing challenges successfully give us the thrill and experience. We just need to shift our attention from results to the pleasure of handling them. The misfortunes in our lives provide challenges that help us to grow psychologically. Psychological wealth is gained from experience of meeting challenges and misfortuned. Thus there is a component of goodness in misfortunes. Challenges and misfortunes provide opportunities for learning and improvements which enables attainment of satisfaction and fulfillment in life. Challenges and misfortunes also provide surprise elements in our lives for the purpose of having some seriousness and suspense in the world. Moreover, without challenges and misfortunes it is not possible to create lots of stories. Personal growth along with challenges and misfortunes provide the direction for story lines needed for sustained interest for the observers.

To face challenges and misfortunes properly we need to learn to perceive them correctly. It is advisable to downplay our worries about challenging situations. Moreover, when our attention is on blaming someone or feeling dejected rather than finding solutions, we lose the time and opportunity for learning to handle and growing from such situations. Therefore our first response to challenging situations and misfortunes should be that of acceptance. After accepting we should turn to the possible solutions. We need to reckon that the primary objective of our lives is to be part of an interesting story. In a story all situations are justified.

The bottom line is that we usually get it wrong about what we should accept and what we should question. We should accept what happens outside of us and question what happens in our minds, instead of our natural tendency to do the other way around.

Internal defects and Self Improvement

The two main methodologies for self improvements are managing internal defects and managing internal process improvements. The internal defects are defects in our perceptions and internal process improvements are process improvements related to our perceptions.

Internal Defects:

We are used to finding defects in our external systems and resolving them. In our efforts to develop our external systems we hardly spare time to develop our internal system, the mind. Mind is an important tool which when developed improves the efficiency of all our endeavors. One of the problems in identifying our internal defects is our ego, which wants to make us believe that we are perfect and all defects are in the external. We need to counter this by saying to ourselves that everybody's thinking and actions are defective. There are defects everywhere by design to provide us an interesting learning curve.

As with external systems, more we reckon there are many defects in our perceptions, the more we will find them. We should never reckon that our thoughts and actions are perfect, but instead, should realize that there is lots to improve upon.

Along with 'presence of defects' mindset another mindset that helps to improve is 'I do not know a lot' mindset. The feeling of confidence that we know a lot hampers our ability to find our own defects. More we reckon our ignorance, the more the inward flow of knowledge.

Internal process improvements:

The five main ways for internal process improvements are as follows:

1. Giving importance to improving our quality of perceptions:

One of the best ways of improving our quality of perceptions is to keep saying to ourselves that how we perceive is more important than whatever we perceive. It helps in this endeavor to believe that everything is justified for the moment because we do not know the underlying reason for that thing to happen. When we do this there is no room for upset or blame and there is only room for improvements. In other words we should regularly keep affirming ourselves that the improvements in perceptions are the most important aspects in our lives.

2. Developing a mindset for improvements:

One of the best ways to develop a mindset for improvements is to keep saying to ourselves that there is always a better way and to know the better way is more important than any end result. There are three things where we may focus during our endeavors. The three things are we, the process improvements and the result. To optimize the performance we need to minimize the importance of ourselves and the end result and reckon that there is nothing else existing other than process improvements.

3. Developing a habit of questioning:

One of the basic ways of self improvement is to develop the habit for questioning for quality and improvements, as a way of life. Some of the questions which we should regularly ask ourselves whenever we need to make a decision about an issue, are as mentioned below.

4. Handling our internal defects:

We should regularly spend some time with ourselves to find our mental defects and resolve them. The process involves first remembering all issues we faced during the day and making a list of areas where there could be improvements. For each defect we need to come up with mental inputs which would do the correcting operation in the mind. Final step is that we should regularly implement the resolutions.

5. Maintaining a peace of mind:

Peace provides the calmness and emptiness that is necessary for performance and progress. Without calmness of mind, there won't be enough bandwidth in the mind for questioning for improvements. To understand this concept let us imagine we are studying for an exam. We will do our best when in regular intervals we keep our mind calm for some time and then question our mind for what we have learnt and also evaluate our learning with a progressive mind to know or guess more about the study. It is the calmness of the mind that provides the necessary drive to arrive at the right level of progress. Without peace of mind the calmness is not found. One of the important ways to keep our mind peaceful and manageable is to try to perceive everything with lower intensity. We need to understand that the mind is unmanageable and disturbed only when we give too much importance to some aspects of life. Therefore, to get an hold on our minds we should identify areas where it wanders frequently and start downplaying the related aspects. The excessive desires and fears are the root cause of such high intensive thoughts.

In summary self improvement is all about the drive to improve with a precondition of peaceful mind and a habit of questioning before deciding.

Perceptions and priorities

The quality of our perceptions is based on the priorities of related aspects present in our memories. One of the important rewarding aspects of our minds is that we can alter the way we perceive different aspects of life by altering the priorities of the aspects being perceived. This can be achieved by repeated mental inputs of some statements which alter the cumulative impressions of the relative priorities of the aspects in considerations. For example we can decide to be smiling even in distress by repeatedly imagining the situations of distress and smiling through. By doing so the priority for smiling will become more than the distress situation, thereby enabling us to smile under such a situation. The negative emotions are not the problem. It is the negative shade that we paint during our perceptions of the problems that make us unhappy. If we keep saying to ourselves that challenges are good we will not get bogged down by the challenges. Our mind will then reason out why the particular challenge is good. What we firmly believe will have higher priority and the aspects related to our firm belief will be more effective. We need to get deeper into the issues to realize the hidden truth of goodness in all aspects of life. If we look for positives in everything we will find positives. It is only our incorrect perceptions which are the cause of our sufferings. Correcting our perceptions is one of the main endeavors in our life. We become how we perceive. Therefore, we must learn to perceive in a way that is advantageous to us.

Few other examples about where our mental affirmations can help are our perceptions about beautiful people and about the rich people. If we keep saying to ourselves that to be not good looking is good and to be poor is good, our minds will find reasons for those statements to be true and our perceptions about them will also change accordingly. Although in reality there is nothing good or bad, some strong affirmations will result in faster change in perceptions.

Our priorities of perceptions for different aspects are related to one another. The following comparisons help us to understand how the relative priorities of various aspects reduce the absolute importance of these aspects. If money is too much important, then we ourselves are that much less important compared to money. If we are ourselves high in importance we should not be dependent on anything or anybody. If we are dependent on others then few other people are also important for us and to that that extent we are less important than when we are absolutely independent. If health is very important then that much money becomes less important. If happiness is very important then to that extent our physical health is proportionally less important. If happiness is all you need nothing else should be too important. But righteousness is more important than being happy. Therefore happiness is not absolutely important. However, things other than being righteous are also required in life. For example aspects like a sense of direction, purpose, meaning, peace, freedom, decorum, creativity, stories etc., are very important besides the above aspects. Therefore we must have appropriate weightings for various aspects, with being righteous as the top priority. We usually have our intelligence with the priorities of perceptions as unknowingly developed by our environment during our early ages. If everything is in track then it is good. If we are not happy then we need to redevelop our priorities of perceptions. This is a long drawn process as it involves gradually updating all the past perceptions. This process involves first contemplating on those statements that keeps the mind calm followed by regular affirmations of those statements that correct the skewed intelligence.

In the nutshell, we need to regularly provide inputs to our mind with right affirmations to correct our priorities of perceptions, which in turn leads to better perceptions.

Basic features of our life

There are only four basic features in our life. They are maintenance, thoughts, feelings and action.
The maintenance of our bodies is based on our physiological conditions and availability of food, water, shelter and air. The internal and external constraints that we face to maintain our bodies provide necessary challenges for our psychological growth and also to provide necessary platform for creating interesting stories for the observer.

Our thoughts and feelings are based on each other and on the perceptions of sense organs. These can be mastered by application of philosophical principles.
Although our thoughts and feelings primarily contribute to our quality of life, they are also part of stories for the higher powers who have access to them.
There are two types of actions, internal and external. External actions are for providing outputs, external to our bodies, while internal actions are for providing inputs to the minds. All our actions are usually directed for the end result of individual or others' maintenance, comforts and fulfillment. However, the end result of all the actions is the perceptions of feelings, which can also be altered by application of philosophical principles. Moreover, our actions are important for the support of the story lines. Therefore all our actions in fact mostly contribute to the observer.

The bottom line is that although our egos make us feel that we ourselves are very important and the world should provide us with all the comforts, all our features provide constraints to present challenging situations for us and also to provide necessary conditions for creating interesting stories for the observer. The quality of performance of all the features of our lives is determined by our perceptions, which depend on our intelligence and expertise. The best way to go about our lives is to improve our perceptions and also ensure to create interesting stories for the observer. Nature is going in a right way where in there is a right mix of constraints for everyone and everyone tries to do his or her best based on his or her mindsets against the odds of conflicting and differing mindsets and resources, thereby creating interesting stories for the observer. It is needless to say that our survival greatly depends on the sustained interest for the observers.

Handling Toxicity

The first thing to do about toxicity is to understand why there is toxicity. Knowing this will reduce the intensity of our thoughts and feelings about the toxic person. The root cause of toxicity is the conflict of interests between people and between us and our creators or God. In fact our conflict of interests with God manifests as conflict of interests among people. People are toxic due to their mindsets, which are formed by their thoughts. Thoughts happen based on predefined algorithm for handling different circumstances. These are managed by the priorities which we maintain for different aspects of life. Therefore, unless we understand the whole process and take efforts to improve the priorities, we are stuck with the same thinking process and mindsets. The toxic person does not know this process but those of us who know can improve our priorities in such a way that we will be able to handle the toxicity in a better way. A start here would be to re-frame the toxicity as a very high level skill requiring situation and look for solutions rather than thinking about the problems.

Following are my suggestions to deal with toxicity.

1. Downplay the situation. Accept that everyone has different circumstances and hence has a place to be as he is to some extent.

2. Don't react to everything. Not every comment needs a response.

3. Accept being misunderstood. No one else needs to understand you.

4. Stay calm when tested. People lose power over you when you don't react. Learn to ignore.

5. Know your worth. When you know who you are, no one's words can shake you.

6. Forgive quickly. Not for them, but so you don't carry the weight.

7. Understand what triggers or causes toxicity in the other person. If it is not you that is the cause, accept the toxicity if the benefits in staying out ways it.

Coping with Difficulties

Some of us are affected by difficulties because we decide to give importance to the problems and not to the solutions or how we want to feel while facing difficulties. The solution for our problems is not about only external improvements, but also about acceptance and acknowledging the silver lining in everything. A good start for looking at difficulties is framing the difficulties as higher level skill needed situations, enabling me to find lots of solutions.

Following are my daily reminders for helping me cope up with difficulties.

• I want to acknowledge that everything is a manifestation of a grand algorithm based on statistical improvements to mathematically arrive at the right proportions of various aspects of our life.

• Therefore, I want to be flexible enough to accept with humility everything that is thrown to me. However, I may still try to improve my life situations without the obsessive need for better results. Usually there are more problems faced by many other groups than what I am facing.

• There is no individuality anywhere. Nothing is happening to me, my family or anyone else exclusively. Everything is happening based on an algorithm. We need to identify with the totality and not individually.

• Let the higher algorithm take over most of the time. Only what is according to the algorithm will happen. Nobody knows the future script. I welcome all possibilities, soft or hard. My doing is only one cent.

• More the acrimony in my life, the higher the opportunity to climb in my psychological status if I keep learning about getting into peace at higher and higher levels of difficulties.

• I want to try to achieve a very high psychological status. Nothing should matter to me as everything happens in HIS control. I shall be never less than anybody else no matter how many times I fail. I am as per the grand algorithm and perfectly placed as I should be.

• With a cool head I would look for options and opportunities in handling the difficulties.

Studying Emotions

Just studying our emotions will help us to regulate them and time them.

Sad, disappointment and anger:

To be sad is a basic emotion due to discomfort, loss or hurt and does not arise from any expectations not met. This is temporary emotion and goes away when the situation changes. Disappointment comes when you expect something which does not happen. This is based on our conditioning. When the disappointment leads to blame, it results to anger. Instead of just trying to be always peaceful, it is better to accept to have sadness due to a loss or discomfort intermittently. If we just accept that it is not so bad at all to be sad, like how a child cries and it is okay to be sad for a while and be mindful to not blame and not expect only happiness we will have good emotional maturity.

Satisfaction, happiness and awe:

Regarding positive emotions we should maximize on satisfaction as it has least energy requirement. Happiness is best on special occasions so that we can have a special feeling. Most of the pleasures have side effects and hence should be very less frequent. The feeling of awe that a child experiences when he sees a toy could be developed to get a better and deeper understanding of little things in life. This also should be experienced only four to five times a day and not always because we need to forget the previous experience to experience the new thing fully.

Therefore, satisfaction at most times interspersed with some sadness and some toppings of awe with one or two tinges in a few months of happiness is the best way to look forward about our emotions. If we just keep saying that to be sad is okay then being sad won't affect us badly. Moreover, since we do not know the real situation, circumstances or the reality, it is better not assume the blame on anything or anyone and not let the sadness become a disappointment or anger.

Real Wealth

Is Elon Musk really rich?

Literally speaking, a person is rich if they hold massive assets—so by that definition, yes, he is rich. Therefore, referencing someone's wealth in this way is perfectly standard. However, there are a few deeper perspectives we should consider when perceiving what it truly means to be "rich."

Money as a built-in constraint: Wealth or the lack thereof can be viewed as a boundary condition in life. The shortage of capital is often what injects seriousness, drive, and challenge into the human experience.

Wealth as a systemic role: Being "the rich person" should perhaps be viewed more as a structural role within a system rather than an ultimate personal goal. For an economy to sustain itself, different levels of financial distribution naturally emerge to drive commerce, investment, and labor.

Everything depends on our mindset: At the end of the day, our reality is shaped by how we are conditioned to view the world. If we train our minds to believe that giving is far more important than getting, that acts as our functional reality.

The power of "enough": When our internal programming shifts, we realize that having just "somewhat enough" money is actually a much healthier sweet spot. It shields us from the anxiety of scarcity, while saving us from the burdens and complications of extreme excess.

Contentment over comparison: True abundance means finding satisfaction in our own current situation rather than trapped in a loop of negative comparison. Comparing our behind-the-scenes lives to someone else’s highlight reel only robs us of our own peace.

True wealth might just be a balanced state of mind.

Effective Communication

The Power of Relaxed Expression

Communication is how we share ideas, connect with others, and make ourselves understood. Whether through writing or speaking, the goal is always to convey thoughts clearly and effectively. But one of the most important, yet often overlooked aspects of good communication is staying relaxed and free from pressure.

Why Pressure Hurts Communication?

When we feel pressured while speaking or writing, our minds become distracted. Instead of focusing on what we want to say, we start worrying about how we're being perceived, whether we're making mistakes, or if we're running out of time. This mental diversion breaks the natural flow of words. Sentences become choppy, ideas get jumbled, and the message loses its impact.

Pressure also makes us rush. We try to fill every silence or finish every sentence quickly, which often leads to using the first word that comes to mind, not necessarily the best one.

The Advantage of Slower, Relaxed Delivery

Speaking or writing slowly gives your brain time to search for better words. It allows you to pause, think, and choose language that more accurately reflects your thoughts. A relaxed pace also helps your audience or readers absorb what you're saying. They don't feel rushed, and you don't feel trapped.

Think of it like walking through a garden: if you rush, you miss the flowers. If you stroll, you notice colors, scents, and details that make the experience richer. The same applies to communication. A slower delivery often leads to clearer, more thoughtful expression.

Lesser the intensity of perception about the matter and the people we are communicating slower will be the delivery and more relaxed will be the mind.

Practice Makes Perfect

Like any skill, smooth and effective communication improves with practice. The more you write and speak, especially in low-pressure environments, the more natural it becomes to stay calm and choose your words wisely. Try reading aloud, journaling daily, or having conversations where you focus not on speed, but on clarity and comfort.

Over time, you'll find that even in high-pressure situations, you can draw on this practiced calmness to communicate with confidence and ease.

Final Thought

Great communication isn’t about talking fast or using fancy words. It’s about being present, staying relaxed, and giving you the space to express ideas clearly. With patience and practice, anyone can master this essential life skill.

Mind Control

Mind control means learning to guide our thoughts, feelings, and actions instead of allowing them to control us. One important reason we struggle with mind control is that we experience certain thoughts and emotions too intensely. Fear, failure, success, and personal ambitions can sometimes become so powerful that they disturb our peace and judgment.

We can slowly develop better control by changing the way we respond to these experiences. We should avoid giving too much importance to fear or failure, and we should not become overly excited about success or ambition. Through regular mental practice, we can learn to view these experiences calmly and realistically.

One useful exercise is to spend more time inputting something to the mind instead of staying ideal and allowing the mind to wander.

It is also important to understand that every thought that appears in our mind is not necessarily created by us. Thoughts often arise automatically from different mental processes, memories, emotions, and outside influences. Some thoughts may support our goals, while others may not be helpful or suitable for us.

Therefore, we should observe our thoughts carefully instead of accepting all of them immediately. When an unhelpful thought appears, we can recognize it and let it go. We do not have to fight it or become angry with ourselves. This process should be gentle and patient rather than forced or intense.

Mind control is not achieved in one day. We should work on the defects on things where we perceived with high intensity and work on them to start perceiving them with lower intensity.

Decision Making

One area where we must and can continuously improve is our decision making ability. This will keep improving our intelligence. Decision making is the process of choosing between different options by carefully weighing various factors. Good decisions come from understanding what matters most and giving appropriate priority to each aspect of life.

Grouping and Weighing Parameters

When facing a decision, it helps to organize factors into meaningful groups. For example, when deciding whether children should use social media, we can group aspects into "benefits" and "risks":

Benefits might include:

- Learning opportunities and access to information

- Social connection with friends and family

- Development of digital literacy skills

Risks might include:

- Exposure to inappropriate content

- Cyber bullying and online predators

- Excessive screen time affecting sleep and studies

Each factor should be given a weight based on its importance. Some risks may be serious but rare, while some benefits may be small but certain. By grouping and weighing these factors, we can make more balanced decisions.

Considering Side Effects and Solutions

Every decision creates consequences. If we allow social media, we must consider potential negative side effects and plan solutions in advance:

- Problem: Too much screen time

→ Solution: Set daily time limits

- Problem: Inappropriate content

→ Solution: Use parental controls and monitoring

- Problem: Social pressure

→ Solution: Teach children about healthy online behavior

Similarly, if we ban social media completely, we must consider what children might miss and how to provide alternatives for learning and socializing.

Decision making isn't only about external choices; it's also about how we manage our internal world. In fact at this moment how we feel, whether happy, sad or contended is the decision we can consciously make instead of our mind making it for us. Moreover, it is important to consider many apparently tiny details like how much importance we need to give to a fellow human being or other beings and the environment. Furthermore, we must decide where to direct our attention at different times. Furthermore, we need to assess whether we are giving too much importance to ourselves and our families. Equality for all is a good benchmark while dealing with people.

The Bottom Line: The key to good decision making is giving the right priority to relevant aspects of life. Our focus should be more on inquiring more options, considering more side effects of options and assigning correct weightage to the options and side effects and not on the results.

Decide the Moment

We are conditioned to feel good when we reckon our body is feeling good, or we are doing financially well or our children are academically and otherwise doing good. Moreover, we feel happy when we achieve something great and especially when we get lots of appreciation. However, it is difficult to always maintain the feel good factor because sometimes there will be worries that some things may go wrong or your expectations go higher. Even if everything is going right, there may be occasions which instill some fear. This much detail is for people, who have whatever they have aspired. This is a small fraction of the population. Unfortunately, the vast majority of people who have scarcity and for whom, this post is intended, won`t get to read this. For such people it is the ideal. Others or the lucky ones can also get some nice perspectives from this post, to get luckier.

Many of us, at most of the time think about big things that are lacking in us, or worry about something that has happened in the past or worry about something that may happen in the future and feel bad about them. We felt bad about them because we gave more importance to those things that did not happen our way. If our primary motive remains to directly feel good at this moment in spite of whatever happening in our lives, we can maximize on those moments. The only thing we have to is to abandon satisfaction from external achievements. We cannot have the cake and eat it too. Therefore, many of us should stop anticipating better times or rather expect challenging times and focus on being satisfied in spite of all the scarcities in life. Once we make a start our mind will start working in new ways. We have lived with the old ways without much luck. Therefore, we are going to start the new way. Since past and future are not guaranteed and the present moment is freely available, we will one day notice that we became more satisfied and joyous than those who went with the old way. We have to just repeatedly self affirm that the only way I want to look for satisfaction and joy is by deciding to be satisfied and joyous in this moment, moment by moment.

Regular Practice

One of the most important aspects of developing any skill or knowledge is regular practice with a focus on continuous improvement. For the vast majority of people, consistent experience and effort outperform raw intelligence or natural talent.

Why Practice Matters More Than IQ

While a few individuals may possess extraordinary natural abilities, research shows that for most people, dedicated practice is the key driver of expertise. Incremental improvements compound over time, transforming small daily efforts into remarkable skills. This principle applies across all fields; from sports and music to academics and philosophy.

The Challenge of Spiritual and Philosophical Growth

In philosophy and spiritual development, simply reading information once or twice is not enough to achieve true understanding or realization. Just as we must progressively improve our physical abilities through exercise, we must also work steadily on our spiritual status through regular practice. The benefits of such practice are often subtle and take a long time to fully manifest, which is why many people abandon their efforts halfway.

The Ten-Year Rule of Mastery

Consider how long it took to learn to read and write properly; more than ten years of consistent practice. Similarly, research suggests that mastering any field requires roughly ten years of dedicated effort, often described as the "ten-year rule" or "10,000-hour rule." This timeline applies whether you're learning a musical instrument, a sport, a language, or philosophical thinking.

Staying Committed to Long-Term Growth

The key lesson is patience and persistence. Just as physical exercise shows results only after months or years of regular effort, intellectual and spiritual growth follows the same pattern. Those who succeed are not necessarily the most talented, but those who commit to regular practice and remain patient with the gradual nature of improvement.

Remember: mastery is a marathon, not a sprint. The compound effect of daily practice, no matter how small, will eventually lead to extraordinary results.

Cognitive Reframing

If we want to decide that going by train is not being poor compared to going by flight to feel happy, we can convince our mind that we are actually travelling many times faster than train or plane. We need to frame it that earth's movement is more significant compared to how we travel. Similarly whether we have big houses or small it does not matter if we give more significance to public common space.

Bottom line is that we can be very happy if we make right decisions about how we want to feel. It is just the mindset created by conditioning that is the problem. Similarly, if we have less money we can reframe our situation as our emotional needs are less. We can just focus on improving our thinking, which results directly into great quality of living.

Cognitive Identification

Instead of identifying with the mind and body and looking for improvements outside, we should identify with the source and look for improvements in the mind and body.

Cognitive Flexibility

One of the main roadblocks to true human intelligence is a lack of cognitive flexibility.

Too often, our deeply held beliefs prevent us from introspecting and reviewing new perspectives. This mental rigidity happens when we attach too much personal importance to our current views.

In many cases, our perceptions become so tightly woven into our identity that we feel we will lose a part of ourselves if we even consider an opposing viewpoint. Our desires, fears, and ego act as shields, preventing us from inquiring deeper into a subject. Even worse, the comforting feeling that "we already know a lot" acts as a massive barrier to our own improvement.

How do we break past this rigidity? By practicing three core habits:

Acceptance: Being genuinely open to others' points of view.

Humility: Acknowledging that our current knowledge is always incomplete.

Introspection: Actively questioning our own biases and motivations.

Cultivating cognitive flexibility trains our minds to investigate rather than conclude. That shift from judgment to curiosity is the true path to intelligence.

Changing Mindsets

Our life is simply determined by our mindsets, which are formed based on the relative priorities we gave to various aspects of life. If we have correctness in priorities and completeness in listing of important aspects, we are sure to be good. Concentrating on only financial and career or business aspects blocks us from our full potential. The biggest bait is the social validation. The main idea is to not give too much attention to any one aspect at the cost of others. We instead pick up an endless race and never try other more interesting avenues. It's also about intensity of perception. When intensity is high we overlook other options. When the intensity is balanced we explore more aspects. In other words, when we give attention to right aspects of life with right intensity based on right priorities, right mindsets are formed.

Mental Dashboard

The real, direct and personal consequences of all our actions and everything we do, is to have thoughts and feelings about them. The other things matter only because we decide to give them importance. While good career, business and relationships help us to have good thoughts and feelings, they also provide challenges that make the thoughts and feelings unhealthy. Therefore, we should look at other avenues to improve our thoughts and feelings. There are three aspects that affect our thoughts and feelings. The first one is where our attentions are at different points of time. The second one is our intensity of perceptions at different points of time. The third one is the relative priorities that we have for different aspects of life. If we have to improve our thoughts and feelings, we have to improve in these three aspects.

You feel happy when you become successful only from your thoughts. You can develop the same thoughts of success without doing any external action by practicing to develop the thoughts directly through other psychological means. Even when you experience powerful or celebrity status you feel good only through your thoughts. For many, the pursuit of success is an addiction like pleasure seeking, which keeps them away from developing our thoughts through other means. To start with we need to just give slightly more importance to our thoughts and feelings than to any external need and try to not relate them to the external world. The thoughts initiated by us should be more than subconscious ones.

Summary: The ultimate purpose of everything we do is to maintain a great internal dashboard of thinking and feeling. All other purposes start and end with good thoughts and feelings. This dashboard has a loose coupling with reality, although it appears to have a tight coupling due to our perceptions of connecting with what has happened. However, it is much larger than physical realities and can be entirely decoupled from the external world by our own mental inputs. We don't need the world to be perfect to feel good; we just need to mindfully manage the thinking and feeling gauges of our own mind. Therefore, we should not give too much importance to other purposes at the cost of negative gauges for thinking and feeling.

Finding Peace

Everyone need not, may not and should not experience this world in the same way. However, if peace is all you want and nothing more or nothing less, this post is for you.

Attention can be given to one thing at a time. Therefore, we can turn our attention to the outer world or the inner thoughts, perceptions and feelings. Accordingly, there is an outer world and there is an inner world. Which world you experience depends on whether you give importance to what happens outside your mind or to the perceptions, thoughts and feelings. We need to have the clarity to know the difference between the two. Peace can only be attained if the focus is on the inner world. Therefore, we need to decide about the relative priorities we want to maintain among the outer and the inner worlds. You can have maximum peace only when you give least importance to the outer world. The outer world needs work for maintenance and the inner world is the true space to live. Even the outer personal life with family or society is work for maintenance, although there is excitement in them. In fact, even in employment, there are sometimes excitements. However our focus is not on the creativity, but on the results. Moreover, the external worlds yield little control and quickly reach their end. However, the inner world is unlimited and endless, till we live.

We should expect an unpredictable or indifferent response from outer entities. Those who believe in external world do not value internal world and those who believe in internal world should not be deterred by external world. In the outer world, all possibilities exist and we should consider that all possibilities have equal weight. Happiness and sadness are both amusement rides in the theme park of life. Don't worry about the rides. Instead, your interest should be to have such a state that the outer world does not disturb you and you get sufficient time to dwell inside your inner world. Just experience oneness with everything and everybody and look to just understand and not to respond. Moreover, classify your thoughts as outer or inner in real term, depending on where the attention prevails. And finally, while perceiving the outer, be mindful and give more importance to the perceptions, thoughts and feelings than the outer aspects.

Psychological Status

Our psychological status is reflected from the importance we give to various things in life. For example if we worry about a result then our status is less than the result. When we always try to put the best foot forward our status is less than the one who is casual. If we desire for something very badly our status is less than what we desire. Similarly to be good and not letting others know is reflective of higher psychological status than letting others know. We lose out on our status when we try convincing others. There is very high probability that our psychological status matters with the higher powers, if not totally, to a significant extent, and will be considered when things actually matter. There will be occasions when a person`s psychological status will be treated higher than any other achievements by God or someone managing the show. Plain logic outsmarts the hype of external accomplishments, which are hyped in our mindsets. On the contrary we will have more equanimity and peace when we develop high psychological status. The bottom line is that we get affected by many things only because our psychological status is less than the priority status for those things.

Stoicism

A stoic person is someone who faces adversity, pain, and hardship calmly and without complaining or showing excessive emotion. If it is just an external avoidance of complaining but having internal burnouts it is definitely not desirable. But what if we develop equanimity in such a way that adversity, pain and hardship do not make us sad or dull? Being such a stoic is certainly desirable. This is possible in two ways. First one is to downplay all our adversities, pain and hardship to the extent that they do not matter. The second way is to perceive adversities, pain and hardships as beneficial due to higher level skills needed to tackle them.

Practicing stoicism helps a lot in thoughts and emotions control. Practicing stoicism will only gradually improve our mind-sets and not make us totally placid if we have lived with our desires, fears and ego for a few decades. If you are just starting your career, I suggest you to wait for a decade or two before getting into this. Instead of the below listed high level philosophical guidelines, the youngsters are suggested to just give a fair level of importance to personal peace and acceptance of others, along with the motivation for a great career.

For seniors, some self affirmations for practicing stoicism are given below. This is like a higher dose of mental patch to make a shift steeply towards the peace. Only by reducing the importance of achievements and failures a highly motivated person can bring about the peace. I am sure if we are more peaceful, we will need lower energy level to achieve the same success. Achieving new developments would be then just a casual habit of questioning rather than a need to be successful.

Self affirmations:

1. All are equal. Every place is similar. Every moment is same.

2. Nothing is personal. Everything is happening to the universal source of existence, called the Brahman in Advaita Philosophy. Both the pain and the pleasure is happening to the Brahman.

3. Nothing is a great achievement. No idea is great. Everything was already conceived by the generative Intelligence of the Brahman.

4. We don't know most of the things. Don't be sure about anything. All possibilities exist.

5. Accept and anticipate negative circumstances. There in more likelihood of happenings that is against our expectations. Everything is about testing our reactions and responses to the negative situations.

6. There is nothing to be happy about if you realize that the Brahman is the one which experiences.

7. There is always a possibility to be sad even though the Brahman is the one which experiences.

8. Keep no baggage about anything in mind. Every heavy thought, either about something good or bad is a burden. Downplay your thoughts.

9. Our getting closer to the end of innings is only thing to look for positively. Leverage something positive from something that will eventually happen.

Non Duality

Proofs of non duality:

1. If god or the first entity had a form then the question about who developed his form will be meaningless.

2. If our creator has to test our thoughts and feelings he has to become us. Therefore he is formless.

3. If creator is formless and we are form then there is no guarantee of perfect integration. Same reason holds good for more than one formless entity being there also.

4. There has to be an underground mechanism for our atoms and molecules to move around. This suggests that the atoms and molecules are also formless.

5. Light behaves differently when we observe it or not. This suggests formless nature of its surroundings.

6. If universe is formless entity it has to be everywhere to maintain equilibrium. Moreover if we talk about existence it has to be everywhere, because it was not created, it is, it was and it will be.

7. If the formless entity is everywhere it cant move.

8. Therefore when we move and the planet moves, only the surface property changes like how a sequence lighting appears while there is no movement of the bulbs.

9. Moreover, our thoughts, feelings memories and the will are also features of interior properties. These properties also change progressively along with movement of the body similar to the surface property changes.

IMPLICATIONS OF NON DUALITY:

1. All possibilities exist in life from a tragedy to joy.

2. There is conflict of interest with our creators. Creators want seriousness and intense stories, while we want peace and happiness. Creators explore all possibilities, where as we get stuck to few.

3. The silver lining is that we can decide how to perceive by prioritizing and managing intensities of perceptions.

4. Acceptance, flexibility and humility are the first steps.

5. Realizing that nothing personal about us is the second step.

6. Logically we are the part that witnesses everything. That which knows that's we are.

7. Physically we do not exist, because our will, memories, shapes, thoughts and feelings are properties that are copied and streamed to the position of the body as it moves, with deletion at previous positions.

8. Equality is reality. If we give right importance to the similarities, equality will be ascertained.

9. Regular affirmations and contemplations are necessary to insulate ourselves from all the possibilities of discomforts in this illusion.

Beyond Non Duality

After realizing Advaita, if we reason out how an egg turns into chicken or how surface properties of shape and interior properties representing feelings or memories get copied and streamed as per the movements of our body, it is obvious there are codes of patterns getting processed or translated all over. Therefore, everything that we see and feel are just patterns of impressions created by a single source of intelligence. Nobody is doing anything to us. Everything is just happening due to the work of the common intelligence.

Therefore, all possibilities exist within its domain. The common source of intelligence is more experienced than our collective intelligence. Therefore, we must accept whatever is happening with the small intent to do what is possible with us, as we want, as per our understanding of the situations. Uncomfortable thoughts and feelings are our reality. Things happen that we do not like because they are also the possibilities. All that is possible is explored based on the timelines by our creators. However, from our side, we need to do our bit to improve our circumstances and decide that all circumstances have some silver linings, which we need to discover. We just need to improve upon our thoughts as much as possible even when circumstances are not so good.

All patterns are of equal importance as they come from a single source of intelligence and work as a single system for a single goal. Therefore, look at everything and everyone as buckets containing different patterns which make up to form the whole. All differences create value for the system and not only the higher ones. Therefore every pattern is indispensable. The value provided for the purpose of characters involved in the various stories of life maintain the sustained interest in the life for the observer and learning opportunities for the observed. The core purpose of our creators is the creativity in the creation and that of the creation is better perceptions of thoughts and feelings. Our thoughts are controlled by few Agentic Intelligence systems external to us. For example, one system may test us with challenging situations, one help us upgrade, one may guide us to the reality etc.. Which system is more active for us depends on our circumstances relative to the story of life. Since, agentic intelligence is active and wants us to do something, ask yourself do you really want to do that or do you really want that? That way we consider more parameters than what is thrown to us by the agentic system. When each one of us learns to respond to our situations in a better way, the world could become a better place. This should be just our intent and not a desire because we do not know the planned timelines of our creators; after all higher powers will always have a degree of control.

The illusion of life

This universe like any complex, vast and workable system has to be thoroughly tested. If thoughts and feelings of a creature have to be tested, the tester has to become the creature to test it. However, to change forms as per wish to test a creature is only possible if the nature of the tester is a formless one. Moreover, the form that we see must have been first designed by a formless entity, because the question about who designed the first form becomes meaningless, if it was a form that developed it. However, there can't be more than one type of dynamic entity forming the universe, because seamless integration of more than one type of dynamic entity without any disorder any time is not possible. If there is a single formless entity it must cover the entire expanse or the whole universe due to the reason that it has to be in equilibrium. This means there was no place for anything else other than the single formless entity, before any form could have been developed. Moreover, we are taking about existence, which must have always existed. Therefore it can be concluded with certainty that this universe is a single, ubiquitous formless entity, which may be called, ‘The being' or 'The Brahman'.

If we consider that the universe is a single formless entity covering the entire expanse, then it is obvious that it cannot move, because there is infinite length to move, requiring infinite force to do it. If we consider that 'The being' can’t move and the universe is expanding, planets and the stars are rotating and revolving, and objects and creatures are moving about, then we can conclude with certainty that the moving objects that we see are mere changes in visible patterns on the 'The being'. The fact that objects can be seen in the mirror when they are not in that position also suggests that our vision is the projection or a reflection on 'The being'. In other words the matter that we see is just a surface visual property of 'the Being'. Since 'the being' cannot move, and the universe, which is a reflection of patterns, which constantly moves, we can conclude that when we feel a pain or pleasure, the sensitivities are actually experienced by different spots of 'The being', even if they are experienced constantly at one part of the body. In other words when we feel a pleasure or pain, the sensitivities have to keep moving to catch up with the movement of the universe in terms of rotation and revolution of earth and movements of our body.

The sensitivity of pleasure or pain can also be considered as just a property in the space in between the atoms because there is no movement in the being and only the properties change by means of execution codes representing patterns sent from somewhere else in 'the Being'. Obviously some codes lead to change in visual effects and some codes lead to change in the sensitivities. Moreover, there are some strong indications that the universe is maintained by some sort of programming on 'the Being'. For example the fact that light behaves like a particle or wave depending of whether it is observed or not clearly suggests that the travel of light happens by some sort of programming. Another fact that suggests that universe exists by programming is that quantum entanglements between particles at large distances at near instantaneous speeds is only possible by prior planning of execution of programs by numerous processors all over 'the Being', much earlier than when we do the experiment, that is when we decide to do it in our mind.

The above points conclude that our bodies are insentient, or without life and the pain and pleasure we experience are impersonal or coming from random spots of 'The being'.

A side effect of the above reality is that the part of 'The being' experiencing pleasure or pain now could be the same part of 'The being' that experienced pleasure or pain some time back for some other person or any other creature. This fact suggests oneness and equality among us in contrary to our mindsets, which always makes us to compare with others for our psychological contentment or elevation.

In conclusion, this universe and the lives of people and animals are illusions while in the reality there is only a uniform, ubiquitous life form, 'The Being'. The bigger illusion is that our bodies are insentient and the pain and pleasures that we experience are actually experienced by random spots of 'The being'.

How does we the realization of the illusion of life help us?

When we consider the life as real and gross our level of suffering during even the least uncomfortable situation is very high. We take ourselves too seriously and hence our problems also are perceived huge. However, when we consider the life as an illusion and subtle, we will take things more lightly and we will suffer less even while going through uncomfortable situations. When we take ourselves less seriously our problems are perceived with less intensity. Because of lower intensity of perception we suffer less, things become more manageable, there is more bandwidth for new insights and there is more self control. There are only three things good or bad that can happen to us. The first one is the changes in our body and our belongings. The second one is changes in our sensitivities of pleasure and pain. The third one is changes in our thoughts. The first two are illusions because they are impersonal. The body is insentient and our belongings are mere reflections of light. The sensitivities are impersonal because our pains and pleasures are fleeting and travelling sensitivities of the underlying life appearing to last in the body due to the travelling reflections of body along with the sensitivities. In other words the sensitivities last only for a nanosecond at one spot of the underlying life and hence they are mere illusions for the body. Therefore, only our thoughts matter. The thoughts really make a difference and are most important of the three. Therefore we should color all thoughts about the changes in body, belongings and the sensitivities as good because they are mere illusions.

Life is about three main aspects. The aspects are to see, to feel and to think. All actions that we perform are for the purpose of maintenance only. Therefore all our achievements are secondary to our primary functions of seeing, feeling and thinking. Seeing and feeling becomes common place when we realize their true nature. Thinking happens in two ways. The first way is the output from the mind to our will as a suggestion. This happens subconsciously. The other way is the input to the mind from our will which happens consciously. Our inputs by way of conscious enquiry and self affirmations are the only ways for improving the intelligence because subconscious inputs are often not sufficient for our growth. Therefore our conscious inputs are the most important aspects to help us to do well in both the three main aspects of life and as well as for success in maintaining life. Four things that everyone aspires are good health, more wealth, more power and better self control. Self control is the most important of these four aspects because without this one the other three can be easily lost and also because with maximum self awareness and self control you can be good with very less of other three aspects. Self control can be achieved to the maximum extent by being one with the source or reality. This can be achieved by first understanding the illusions of life and practicing to be one with the source of life or reality.

How to be one with the source or reality?

You are just the ego. Everything else is not you. Problem happens when the ego identifies with the body which is just a reflection and gives it more importance than what it deserves. Ego takes birth from identifications with some patterns as self. Ego is maintained by identification with thoughts and feelings. Desires and fears add fuel to this identification. The ego hides the reality from us and we become part of the samsara, or the drama of life. Therefore to realize the true nature of the world, we need to first give up our desires and fears, following which we need to disown the body as mere reflection. Furthermore we need to realize that the sensitivities that we feel are transitory but appear constant due to the travel of the reflection of the body along with fleeting sensitivities in the life source. In other words the sensitivities do not last more than a nanosecond at one spot of the ubiquitous life source, even though for the body the sensitivities appear to remain for a longer period, based on the present story of life.

Therefore we must realize that the sensitivities are not personal to us, but are part of 'the being'. The sensitivities appear to be present for some duration due to the body's (reflection) movement along with the sensitivities.
After realizing the illusions of body and sensitivities one (our will attached to the ego) must do self affirmations by regularly identifying with different spots outside of the body. In other words we must do the affirmation 'I am that' referring to anything outside the body. When we do this affirmation for a long duration our identification with the body and the sensitivities keep reducing.

Conclusion

Being identified with the source of life by realizing the illusions and practicing to be one with the source by self affirmations, bring about the kind of self control that is necessary in conditions of extreme sufferings. All types of knowledge and practices can have a place in future and hence should not be ignored but maintained somewhere with the future generations.

Nature of life

We have seen in topic 3 that this world is an all-pervading, single life entity, which can be called 'The Being', which can change patterns in its memory space and experience projected imaginary sense perceptions based on the patterns. We will go little deeper about "The being". Any point in the being can be in one of the three states. The three states are consciousness, a color or shape and sensitivity. For the sake of simplicity, I will call the color and sensitivity patterns as an imagination of being based on codes received by it. There are some patterns which are just impressions or memories. Thus broadly speaking any part of the being can be in one of the three functions, a function of being an impression, an imagining function or a function of being in conscious of some other state.

This consciousness function when switches consciousness between various imagining function of a specific being in a time sharing algorithm, it gives an illusion of being the form. These functions happen based on some impressions or codes being sent from some part of the being. The functions are similar to in a computer, wherein they have many inputs spaces, which creates codes and transmit them to other parts, many processor spaces which converts the code into objects of the world.

Now the question arises 'who am I?’ At one level there is just 'the being' and everything else is an illusion. However, logically we are just the part of consciousness attached to the individual will, as it is what through which we experience the world. Each part of 'The being', that has a separate will, is an individual entity, experiencing different realities. Moreover, the impressions of the decisions of the individual wills, which although they are stored in separate memory space, is like its appendage, because, till the individual entity is bound to the 'human being', these memories form the intelligence of the individual entity. Therefore I am the conscious will with some memories attached.

I cannot be something which was created by someone else. Therefore, I am that part of the being that creates something and that which was not created by someone else. My body and mind are created by someone else (god) and so those are not me. The free will, attached to my body always existed in the space assigned to my body. So I am the part of 'the being' (consciousness) which is attached to my will.

This world is joint collaboration of the will of god, our individual wills and the features already present in 'the being'. Nothing can be made from nothing. So 'The being' always existed. The only thing that differentiates me from the creator (god) is their privilege to access and edit the impressions of all of memory spaces. The other memory spaces like me are only programmed to witness the sense perceptions, thoughts and feelings and make decisions about them. In other words, the other memory spaces do not know that they have free will. Before they could know about their free will, they are sabotaged by the creator memory space, such that the other memory spaces do not have time to experiment and discover themselves. We just have a small window of options to decide from our thoughts and feelings.

I am just one autonomous memory space in 'the being', which is programmed to witness and decide about what is being projected by some other memory spaces. I make my decisions based on the priorities maintained in a distinct memory space of 'The Being'. What I see, feel, hear, taste and smell are the projections of different autonomous memory spaces of 'the being', about which I am programmed to be continually aware. There are three main features of the human mind. They are vision, thoughts and sense perceptions. The vision is some sort of imaginative projection based on a database of impressions at some other memory space. The hearing, smell, taste, pain and other feelings are related to the imaginations of sense perceptions by the memory spaces in the space covered by our body. The thoughts are continuous semantic interpretations of the perceptions and other impressions, along with some extrapolation. There is one memory space for visual aspects, one for thought process and few others for feelings. I am the memory space being conscious of these different memory spaces based on a queue, similar to a CPU pipeline, with a small window to decide about the thoughts provided to me. In a single entity with multiple facets (impressions, consciousness and imagination) without time sharing of consciousness with imaginations of different memory spaces, such a world is not possible.

In summary, I am just a will representing a part of consciousness, in an autonomous memory area of 'the being', which regularly becomes aware of the imagination of vision by a different part, along with the imagination of thought processes and feelings by some other parts, which are programmed to appear to be coming from a human being, in a time sharing algorithm. I am not anything else or the complete human being, because, I can be only be that part, over which I have total control, and that which was not made by some other part.

Truth of life

The realization that our bodies are life-less and is just an imagination of all-pervasive soul is the fundamental realization that releases all the bondage of this world. Even if we realize that this life is an illusion or a virtual reality, there is sufficient thrill in it to embrace it. After achieving self-realization, we will reckon that we are taking part in the virtual reality as a role in a suspense movie (similar to playing a video game) based on our own understanding of the script of life and will not take anything personally or too seriously. The intensity of pleasure and pain will be much lower after self realization and our minds will be clear and peaceful. However due to the imagination of the soul and some identification with the body, the discomfort due to pain cannot be fully avoided even after self-realization. Therefore it does matter about how we deal in this virtual reality.

Nothing is happening to me. I am simply not there in the picture. My idea of myself is not real. Even the person I am thinking about is not there. There are no belongings and attachments either. Everything is just happening to the source of existence, the Brahman. Therefore, my problems are not my problems. My success is not my success. Everything is happening as per the stories scripted by the GOD. Therefore, nothing is happening personally to us to worry about. Things affect us more only when we give importance to what has happened.

The ego takes birth in childhood when the consciousness of the thoughts, feelings, actions and senses is identified with their ownership of the self and we start taking things personally. It lures us with little happiness and creates bonding of desires, fears and compulsions. The primary consequence of this is that we start to perceive many things very intensely and our mind gets heavy and confused due to high intensity repeated thinking, whenever we come across a event that is attractive or repulsive. Two things are important about the ego. The first one is that it is not real. Everything is like a single fabric of existence that is happening based on the codes written by some of its parts. Our personality is actually nowhere in the scheme of things, but gets assumed due to selective consciousness of a shape with patterns of sensitivity. The second one it that the ego may be good for a few lucky ones, but most of us are more affected by it, than being helped. Therefore, if our soul (part of existence we are connected with) has to remain free, we need to shed our ego. Moreover, ideally, we need to also reckon other people without their ego or individuality. In other words there should not be a perception of separation between people. Therefore, if the life creates unbearable hardships to us or if we wish to get closer to the reality, we should come out of the illusion of life by daily contemplating on the truth that only Brahman exists.

However, in spite of realization of truth of life, we need to still play the game of life with the best of our ability for the reasons of challenging and fascinating situations it provides and for the honor of the creators, who have spent millions of years to make such a great possibility of this world for us. Some recognition of little silver linings here and there and a little consideration of someone else and God are all that are needed for achieving a satisfying life. How we individually perceive the world is more important to us than the reality. Therefore, we should perceive for maximum satisfaction for us individually, rather than just having a desire for maximum satisfaction. However, we should have consideration for other relevant aspects which are present in the game of life; but without too many attachments.

The bottom line is that life is best lived when everything is perceived with the right priorities. After grouping weightage for all relevant aspects as per the possible choices, the right decision could be the choice with the best balance. For example, if we consider the reasons for external achievements and internal improvements we may arrive at the balance of 40% effort for external pursuits and 60% effort for mental developments to balance the thrill of challenges and stress with peace and reality.

More on who am I?

There is a single giant being with changing patterns and sensitivities. This may be called the existence. The mini universe of existence form when parts of patterns and sensitivities are identified as an individual. This identification gives rise to the ego, which enables the patterns and sensitivities to be seen as a story with itself as the main character. The egos are just bubbles of identification, which die when the character in the story dies. This is exactly like we are experiencing a film although with apparent identification as reality. Logically we are just the nonexistent ego. Physically we are just the existence with changing patterns and sensitivities. Because of the logical connection of ego with the existence, the resultant of sum of the parts of existence is more than the summation. Our brain creates a movie from changing patterns and sensitivities in the existence and the ego gives it importance to make it a story when a part of it is conscious of some patterns and sensitivities. Before a part in the brain becomes conscious of some patterns and sensitivities and the illusion of identification happen, all that existed was patterns and sensitivities Therefore, the world of illusion exists due to the identification of combination of physical parts with the logical constructs of ego. Therefore, keep watching the movie if you are enjoying it. When you stop liking it deconstruct the ego. There are side effects for both living with ego and without it. When you live without ego, you do not try to achieve more and hence others would not appreciate you. When you live with ego, the one without it would consider you as living in the illusion. In other words, both types consider the other type as delusional. Do you want to go with the majority or risk to being real and different?

Disease, aging and death

Decease, aging and death appear very gruesome only because we have not prepared for them. Our perceptions about them in the right perspectives will enable us to go through them in a better way. We need to accept that everyone goes through these in different stages because our life is built to go through these. For our creator disease, aging and death are important features to develop interesting and serious enough stories of life. Disease, aging and death provide us with challenging and constraining situations. These situations are vital to make our lives interesting for us and for the observer. One way to pass through these situations is to daily contemplate that our bodies are not sentient and the underlying life never dies. We are there to carry out our roles and after the role is over we will be a child again. More than the pain of these situations the fear of pain causes immense suffering. It will greatly help to alleviate our sufferings if we daily contemplate to reduce our desires, fears and ego. In fact by daily affirmations we can perceive diseases and death to be advantageous for us and live a happy life even through these situations. Like there is life insurance for financial aspect of our life, regular contemplation for preparing for disease, aging and death is like insurance for the psychological aspect. In other words if we daily say to ourselves that disease, aging and death are good, after few months our perceptions about these will become positive and we will no longer suffer from these even when these come to us. When we have a positive feeling towards pain, its intensity reduces to some extent. There will be just slight discomfort due to pain, which can be managed through medicines. Doing such affirmative practice will increase the number of good moments out of our total waking moments.

In summary, if we regularly imagine ourselves with various types of diseases, including all their related complications, with a kind of acceptance that they are for our good, we will not be bothered about those situations, before we experience those situations and will also be better prepared to experience those situations, when they come to us. This is similar to pregnancy, faced by women, who take it gracefully, expecting that the end result will be good. Even diseases, aging and death will be perceived as good if god came and told us that we will be reborn as cute child. Therefore, if we believe that our god, who has to work with trillions of beings and for trillions of years, would have a maturity to develop a system, which will be reasonably fair for all in the long run, then it is reasonable that we not fear anything and instead work out of all situations. It is the fear of those situations, which make more damage than the actual situations. Therefore to maximize good moments in life we need to regularly make mental affirmations that disease, aging and death are for our good.

Main realizations in philosophy

The following are my main realizations in philosophy.

1. The mind is in better control if we start perceiving everything with lower intensity. Moreover, we will be more intelligent and mindful when we are able to perceive everything with less intensity. On the contrary, when the intensity of perception of any aspect is very high, our mind ignores the other relevant aspects, which will lead to incorrect decisions, thinking, feeling, and actions.

The only side effect of perceiving with lower intensity is that we will not remember our memories after few minutes. We should manage this aspect with keeping alarms and time tables.

To keep our perceptions lighter we should keep reducing our attachments, desires, fears and ego on regular basis.
2. We can perceive everything the way we want by regular mental affirmations. For example we can perceive hardships as better than luxury, poor as better than rich, diseased as better than healthy, stressful as better than calm. Only when we perceive some things as negative they affect us more. Therefore, we should look to get satisfaction more from internal aspects of the mind rather than from external aspects of the world. The external aspects should be just like playing a game with sportsmanship in such a way that we may accept losing as a part of the game.

3. The mind works based on relative priorities of various aspects of life. Therefore, we must spend efforts in maintaining right priorities for important aspects of life. For example, if one gives more importance to the results than their own psychological status, there will be less peace and more anxiety. To relatively improve our psychological status, we should downplay the results to such an extent that achieving it is like just drinking a glass of water. Another example will be if we prioritize wealth over health, then we will allow ourselves to burn out working hard. Similarly, if we prioritize health over mental or psychological wellness, we may worry too much about our minor health problems instead of just doing what needs to be done. Besides health, wealth, and psychological wellness, we need to prioritize security so that we are not very vulnerable. Everyone has to give importance to safety aspects as per their needs. Another aspect is freedom, which is quite essential for healthy living. Freedom to think, say, and act within proper limits is a basic fundamental necessity. Since we need many aspects like health, wealth, psychological wellness, family, career, knowledge, skill, freedom, security etc. , which are almost all equally important, we should not give too much importance individually to any of this, because the relative importance of any individual aspect should be low, when all aspects are considered. On the contrary, when the intensity of perception of any of above is very high our mind ignores the other relevant aspects, which will lead to incorrect decisions, thoughts, feelings and actions. Furthermore, we should give more importance to present than the past or the future, to be in line with giving more priority to psychological wellness and knowledge compared to wealth and health. Wealth and health should be a byproduct of our engagement in life as per the right priorities, rather than an important objective to be met. Finally, we should ask ourselves whether we ignored any important aspect relating an issue while perceiving it.

4. Only Brahman exists and our body and mind are just illusions created by property changes at its different points. When the body moves, only the coding patterns for visual property moves and when the body feels something the coding pattern for feel property moves parallel to the movement of the body. Therefore what happens to the body is not personal to us and therefore, we should give very less importance to our health issues, while doing what needed to be done for the maintenance of the body, similar to how we maintain an automobile.

5. One of the most important aspects of our lives is where we focus our attention during our lifespan. Anything exists for us individually only when we pay attention to it. To only look to achieve external aspects like, career or business is suboptimal. To look inside and improve our minds we need to witness, listen, read, recollect and contemplate on spiritual truths. Moreover, we should think about our problems only when we are trying to find a solution for them. Having known that all that exists is Brahman and coding patterns in it, why we should brood about anything unless it helps us. Our attention should be more on our daily routine and daily improvements in our psychological status.

6. There is a higher intelligence with tremendous knowledge, which it acquired over millions of years, which oversees the universe. The only reason that we find some things as unfair is only because we take many things personally where as everything is justified at the proportion at which it is happening as the story of life is developed by millions of years of research as may be estimated by the robustness of the design that takes into consideration many aspects like story content, righteousness, learning curve, horror, tragedy, pleasures, pains, imaginations, thrill, seriousness, humor etc. in the right proportion. Therefore, we should accept that anything can happen to anybody and everyone should accept to some extent negative things happening to them.

7. Our present decisions, thoughts and actions is based on our past inputs as perceptions, external stimuli and higher intelligence. At times the higher intelligence control our decisions, thoughts, feelings and actions based on the story that is evolving, which takes into consideration our past inputs as perceptions and also the past inputs and perceptions of those connected to us.

Therefore, we may say that we only have partial free will. We only have control over how we want to perceive everything and not the end results. Moreover, if things do not go well, we should try not to blame ourselves with guilt.

8. Being good is important for us to grow spiritually. We can absorb the spiritual concepts only when we are not selfish.

9. Basically we are all equal because all that we all do is to mostly think, talk, move around and move things around. It is just that we individually give more importance to some people that they are perceived to be more than others. If all aspects around the individual and his circumstances are considered, we are all equal.

10. The psychological satisfaction derived from achieving external accomplishments can be easily achieved by mental inputs. Therefore, we should not bother if success in career or business is not coming by. Moreover, we should be less concerned with what others' think of us and build a psychological status independent of external situations.
11. We should not believe our thoughts without validation. The mind just extrapolates our memories and suggests to us the story behind everything, which does not know the real happenings. We need to be mindful and only consider the suggestion and wait for more suggestions without deciding immediately. After considering each possibility and further analyzing based on some rules, we should finally conclude. The slower our thought process and decisions, the better the results will be.

12. There is a silver lining in all negative events. We should always look for a better perspective in all negative encounters. We should give more importance to the silver lining than the obvious aspect to keep our minds in a good state.

13. Everything that we perceive is temporary and becomes insignificant with the passing of time. Therefore, we should not take our successes and failures seriously. Only because we give our success too much importance, we get upset with our failures.

Nine Profound Truths

Following are the nine profound truths, which our mindsets may not allow us to realize. There are opposing forces for preventing all the good in the life. Lucky ones break the barriers and get a glimpse of the subtle enlightened moments which transcend the material world.

1. Nothing really matters to us. Things appear to matter to us only because we perceive them as they matter to us. Therefore, do not worry about anything and don't look for anything other than challenges and difficulties, which allow you to grow psychologically.

2. We do not know anything; not sure about anything. We are ignorant about the deepest aspects of our life and highest level of truth. Therefore, do not perceive with high intensity and downplay all your thoughts as incorrect and insufficient.

3. We can perceive everything the way we want; negative as positive, bad as good, ugly as beautiful, poor as rich.

Therefore, we should perceive to our advantage for the moment.

4. Ultimately higher powers will handle everything. They do their things at the last after giving everyone a chance. Trust them. They just bring things to a range. Higher powers have maximum flexibility in their expectations. Similarly if we have to have good moments we should have maximum flexibility in our expectations. Things don`t have to be in a particular way. They can be okay this way or that way. Sometimes this way is okay and sometimes the other way. Which way it turns out in our case is a separate matter.

We can only make or break around ten percent. Lower beings have more attachments to the results. In fact even our decisions are greatly influenced by different levels of higher powers. Therefore, relax and reckon everything is as it should be. Go for flexibility, humility and acceptance.

5. Everything has side effects. The side effects of many repeated decisions usually compound over time to significant proportions. Goodness also has side effects. Extreme views have more side effects. Even happiness has side effects.

Happiness creates expectations, which may lead to disappointments later. It may also lead to future events that bring sorrow. Happiness may lead to lack of sympathy from someone who matters and who may choose a sad person over the happy one. A different example for side effects would be that if we speak our heart out there are side effects and if we keep everything secret there are side effects. Therefore, a balanced approach, which considers all the side effects, is often recommended.

6. We are just the false identity called ego. There is nothing personal about us.

We identify with some patterns as ourselves. Therefore, do not be attached with yourself, because reality is more important than established illusion.

7. Everybody else is also non entity, or just patterns moving around. We name them and get attached to them as human beings. Therefore, do not be attached with anyone, because reality is more important than the established illusion.

8. Our psychological status is the most important thing; it is more important than any other type of wealth. Therefore, do not perceive your health and wealth with high intensity. Identify with something vast like the Brahman instead of fragile ego.

9. We have only one moment at a time, therefore, we should live the moment fully, at most moments of time, by deciding to be satisfied for the moment. Everything else in this moment is secondary. We need to just do only as much other things as is absolutely necessary.

CONCLUSION

1. Physical pain is the real problem that we have to face in this life because there is a remedy for all psychological suffering faced by us. A change in mindset by regular mental inputs is all that is needed to achieve a psychological state in which nothing matters. Moreover, we can decide how we want to reckon about our pains, which are in fact sensitivities in the random parts of the single source of life. If we accept the pain as something not personal and beneficial in the sense of supporting the narrative of story of life, then we do not get bogged down by it.
2. If we consider all aspects that are similar for everyone and the side effects of both good and not so good aspects in life, we can rightfully conclude that equality persists.

3. We should give more importance to deciding for satisfaction in this moment than to other aspects that may give satisfaction in the future. The plan for future should be only for maintenance of life and not a never-ending endeavor to seek things in life.
